Attn: Mr. Goodwin

Dear Mr. Goodwin:

25X1A9a

You may recall that when I last visited your office, primarily to read [REDACTED] manuscript, I offered to submit my draft bibliography on Intelligence and National Security to an informal review process. We did not, at that time, work out any details of this review process.

Within a month I expect to have available copies of the Supplement to this draft bibliography, pages 316-838, plus a revision of my introductory critique of the literature, necessitated by the location of additional materials in the public domain.

I can delay distributing this Supplement to students in Harvard's National Security Policy Seminar for a limited time, should there be any item(s) of an objectionable nature. Between the time that this Supplement is distributed and university press publication of a bibliography, approximately 2 out of every 3 entries must be eliminated (for reasons of economy---though most of the literature is junk anyway). The more selective bibliography is likely to receive fairly widespread distribution; since I shall be removing 2 of 3 entries anyway, I could easily remove a few more should there be any particular problem in bringing attention to any particular item(s) which, though in the public domain, present problems about which I have no knowledge. Needless to say, I would not make any reference to the fact that this bibliography had been submitted to CIA for review, just as I make no reference to active intelligence officials who have offered comments or criticisms.

Although I am loathe to submit this manuscript to separate review by a dozen different departments, I would have no objection to your coordinating any review with the FBI, Defense, etc. Since the Director of Central Intelligence is charged with responsibility for protecting intelligence "sources and methods," under the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, I have assumed that any review, should any be desirable, would be coordinated through your office, notwithstanding the fact that I have never been an Agency employee. What work I have done for the Office of the Secretary of Defense really has no relationship to this bibliography; therefore, should any review be effectuated, I assume that it will be effectuated through your office.

When this Supplement is completed, I shall send you a copy. Should any deletions be desirable, I would appreciate learning of them within a few weeks of your receipt of this Supplement, so that this process will not unnecessarily disrupt revisions for publication.

Sincerely yours,
